The program Digital Cultures and Media Production (DC&MP) aims at training professionals who are capable of working in varied industries; however, the main focus for students will be medialization of intellectual work, creation of media products that are in demand at modern universities, educational organizations and research centers.

To this end, the program is deeply integrated into the experimental educational space of SAS: apart from technical skills of audiovisual production, our Master's degree students will obtain a profound understanding of history and theory of film and media, a broad interdisciplinary worldview and extensive practice of creating media products that would broadcast the intellectual life at SAS into the world, including in coordination with SAS MA program in Experimental Higher Education.

The interdisciplinary and cross-media approach is at the foundation of the program. Students do not only explore the history of media development, but also get involved in the processes of creating a variety of media products; along with practical professional skills, they acquire the skills of critical thinking and theoretical reflection.
