In order to be efficient and successful as a public administrator, it is necessary to possess knowledge and experience in three main fields: economics, management, and law. This program offers a high level of training in economics, because economic justifications are often lacking from many government decisions. Micro- and macroeconomics are taught side-by-side with the theory and practice of the management of state finances, urban economics, econometrics, budgeting techniques, and socio-economic statistics. Graduates work in state and municipal government bodies, public organizations, and business structures.
